City hiring non-profit group to supervise graffiti offenders

by Lindy Magner

Though the city's anti-graffiti ordinance was adopted last spring, it was not clear then how youths would be supervised if they agreed to work their way out of prosecution through community service.

Last week, the City Council gave conceptual approval for the city to contract with a local, non-profit organization which would oversee such community service.

The anti-graffiti ordinance gives law enforcement the option of referring youths for the community service program instead of referring their case to the District Attorney for prosecution, if the youths are willing to participate and have caused under $5,000 in property damage.

Those youths will then be assigned between 24-80 hours of community service, half of which must be performed while accompanied by a parent or guardian. In addition to painting out graffiti, work will include mowing, weeding and picking up litter.

San Diego Youth Involvement, Inc., an organization with programs for troubled and homeless youths including East County Help Ourselves (ECHO), is expected to soon be awarded $1,575 in start-up costs to administer the program, utilizing staff and classrooms at its Lemon Grove headquarters.

According to a report drafted by Assistant City Manager Doug Yount, contracting with a private organization seemed a more cost-effective and workable alternative then others which included utilizing city public works crews, hiring additional staff or soliciting volunteers.

Though Lemon Grove Sheriff's substation statistics show that only three youths would have qualified for the diversion program last year, City Manager Jack Shelver believes that contracting with the organization to oversee youths is "the way to go."

"Yes, we believe its cost-effective, and, we think that in the future, there will be more youths caught doing graffiti," he said.

Other advantages listed by Yount include the ability of the organization to complement the hours of community service with classroom discussions in which offenders and parents participate in discussions and exercises on vandalism, self-esteem and parenting.

H. D. Murphy, founder and executive director of San Diego Youth Involvement, feels classroom time is important, especially for parents of offenders.

"We want to help them with their parenting skills and show them how to meet their responsibilities as parents," he said.

He explained that youths already participating in his ECHO program have been performing cleanups in El Cajon as well as near the organization's headquarters on Palm Avenue.

Those work crews will soon be used citywide on a regualr basis, not only when they include youths who have violated the city's anti-graffit ordinance. Murphy anticipates that he will be able to put work crews throughout the city on a weekly basis.

Start-up funds, if approved at the Oct. 5 City Council meeting, will be used to purchase a lawn mower, weeder blower, rakes and shovels, as well as paint supplies and flyers for advertising the availability of cleanup crews, said Murphy.

Local study shows connection between alcohol and domestic violence

by Lindy Magner

Since last November, Sheriff's deputies at the Lemon Grove substation have been doing something different when responding to domestic violence calls.

They've been taking notes.

Documenting the correlation between domestic violence and alcohol consumption is a yearlong study jointly undertaken by the Lemon Grove Prevention Project and the local sheriff's command.

With 10 months of study completed, Sheriff's Capt. William Flores now can report that 12 percent of the calls coming into his Lemon Grove command station are reports of domestic violence, and of over 800 incidents documented to date, about 37 percent of those incidents involve the use of alcohol. The study will conclude in November, but Flores states that though the numbers will change, the patterns will not.

According to Karen Zaustinsky, Prevention Project director, the local study is noteworthy because it documents almost every case of domestic violence, not just those which result in emergency room care.

"Traditionally, studies on domestic violence use information from emergency rooms and shelters for battered women, so you're only seeing those cases with a certain degree of injury," she said.

Also, unlike national studies this one is centered specifically on the area served by the Sheriff's substation which in addition to Lemon Grove, includes Spring Valley, Jamul and the unincorporated areas of La Mesa and El Cajon.

Of the 800 cases of domestic violence reported since last November, 210 cases were in Lemon Grove alone.

Whenever deputies responded to a domestic violence call, they filled out a supplemental form noting injuries sustained and substance use by suspects and victims. Drug use was noted in 7 percent of the cases, said Flores.

The statistics for Lemon Grove show that when both victim and suspect were using alcohol, the likelihood of actual injury was 79 percent; whereas, where alcohol was not a factor, a 38 percent injury rate was found.

Suspects and victims who consumed alcohol were found mostly in age groups over 31, with 50 percent of alcohol-related violence found in the 41-79 age group. Male victims of domestic violence were more likely to be in this latter age group, a finding which Flores finds interesting.

Not surprisingly, most victims of domestic violence were women, though there were cases of men as victims.

Of all domestic violence calls, 75 percent involved physical violence, with 32 percent of the cases involving injury, 12 percent requiring medical attention. When male suspects consumed alcohol, 73 percent of the cases involved injuries, whereas when they did not, 40 percent involved injured victims.

"When alcohol is a factor, injury and the need for medical attention is significantly increased," Flores said, noting that such cases caused deputies to spend more time at the scene, arresting suspects and waiting for paramedics to arrive.

The study also found that incidents of domestic violence are more frequent in low-income, high-density residential areas often within close proximity to alcohol outlets, said Flores.

The fact that Flores sits on the board

Personal comments of Councilman Bob Burns

Losing Moore

I have, on occasion, offered my testimony of affection and appreciation for hometown individuals. I am sad to report that one such friend is moving to Casa de Oro and will not be seen as frequently in Lemon Grove as in the past.

I would rather write such a testimonial instead of a eulogy, because too often we are not moved to show appreciation to someone until it is too late to do it in person.

For many years, a young man, (I say that because he looks forever young - despite his passing the half-century mark recently) who has been a part of Lemon Grove in every respect, is leaving our midst. William (Bill) Moore has been a very familiar sight, riding his bicycle around town, which probably accounts for his youthful appearance.

A Grove Pastry Shop regular in the early morning caucus, Bill can always be counted on to contribute to the discussion, be it the state of the city or the world. His cheery smile will be missed by the bake shop crowd and the staff. We somehow know that he is not extremely wealthy, but he is generous in ponying up the cost of coffee at times.

We, of St. John of the Cross parish, will miss him the most. He is the most dependable member, and he never misses an opportunity to work on the church projects. The prayer group, the welcoming committee, the parish council, the bazaars, the festivals, and many other functions, will always find Bill in the thick of the work.

The Knights of Columbus rate him one of their most valuable members. This will be a great loss to St. John's, when he transfers to a neighboring parish. Bill will also be missed by the Congregational Church on Glebe Road. He has assisted them for many years in a variety of ways, living close by.

Bill has lived with his sister for many years, and will be moving with the family when they go to their new house in Casa de Oro. They are Mary Lou, and her husband Dr. Simon C. Brumbaugh, and are known by many as longtime residents of Lemon Grove. We should also be thanking them for their many contributions to our town, with Bill being a major one. One often has the perception that it is necessary to be highly educated, or extremely skilled in one fashion or another, to contribute meaningfully to a community. Not being so is a common excuse for not participating in any of the many civic affairs around us.

Bill is an excellent example of what one can do by simply being willing and eager to help in any way that one can. The totality of his accomplishments puts to shame the few things that some of us consider as great. Putting one's talents, small or great, to the fullest benefit on a continuing basis, can mean so very much more.

Thanks, Bill, for all that you have done for our town, our church and our family of friends. There will always be a cup of coffee for you in Lemon Grove. Come back to see us often.

Domestic violence

of the Prevention Project facilitated his cooperation in the first documentation of domestic violence incidents in the county.

"Domestic violence as a serious problem which is increasing. I have to take steps to protect a class of victims, just as I would if I was protecting business owners experiencing a rash of robberies," he said. "I thought we needed to take a closer look at domestic violence."

Compilation of the data is performed by a committee which includes both Zaustinsky and Flores, as well as a county statistician.

According to Zaustinsky, the purpose of the study is to provide concrete information which can be used as a guideline for community action.

"The results show that domestic violence isn't isolated from alcohol and drug use, and suggest that if you want to do something about domestic violence, then you have to do something about alcohol," she said.

Studies are part of the mission of the county's 15 alcohol prevention projects which are funded with state and federal monies. The Lemon Grove Prevention Project began about two years ago as a pilot program.

According to Zaustinsky, its activities have centered on informing residents about how they can become involved in reducing the availability and promotion of alcohol in their community.

She often speaks before school parent and faculty groups as well as service clubs, and mobilizes residents to testify at City Council meetings against the proliferation of alcohol outlets.

"The literature we have suggests that half of all the social problems we have are related to the use of alcohol," said Zaustinsky, noting that her information was utilized by the Planning Commission in developing the alcohol ordinance which the City Council has tentatively approved.

She noted that other prevention projects also mobilize residents to speak before councils and planning agencies, though each focuses on the specific concerns of that community.

Our purpose is to increase community awareness of these issues and work with residents to strategize solutions and create healthier communities," she said.

The Lemon Grove Prevention Project's board of directors includes the school superintendent, teachers, local business people and a City Council member.

City seeks survey answers

The city's most recent newsletter contains a survey form produced by the Safe Community Project.

The grassroots group, chaired by Dr. Bob Burns, is an outgrowth of the countywide Safe Communities Summit held last spring to encourage community leaders to begin pro-active groups to work on concerns such as crime.

The survey will help the group determine the concerns of residents and the percentage of those who've been directly affected by crime.

Several weeks ago, the City Council appropriated $2,000 for the study and its compilation. Residents are encouraged to fill out the forms and return them as soon as possible.

Commentary

There's no place like home

by Paul Treske

For several months now, the daily newspapers and television stations have treated us to accounts of Southern Californians fleeing our dirty, overgrown and crime-ridden environs for more pastoral settings, mostly to the north of us. We have read op-ed page pros and cons of leaving the southland; we've learned about the irritation of the good citizens of San Luis Obispo at being overrun by Angelinos; and we've lost more than a few friends to the bucolic, if rainswept, regions of Oregon and Washington.

Now comes an article in last week's Union-Tribune recounting the saga of a local family who moved to the fresh air of Couer d'Alene, Idaho only to be driven out by neighbors who apparently hated all strangers, especially those from California.

It is understandable that those with young children find it difficult to picture them growing up strong and honest with crime and drugs proliferating all around us. For them, the image of a pretty, little house in a rural setting, free of drugs and crime, where all the neighbors' children are joyous, clear-eyed and straight-limbed, and no-one brings guns to school, is clearly a siren's call. Many of us, in moments of frustration, fear or stress, have dreamed of a rural setting where the pace is slower and the demands fewer.

But if we pause a moment to think, we realize that what we are and what we fear follows us to any destination. And knowing what people are really like, we quickly understand that, even in a rural retreat, we have neighbors and we have no way of predicting what those neighbors are really like. In addition, like it or not, we carry our own familiar way of living and our local mores with us. Everytime I return to my hometown back east, I become immediately aware of how much my life in California has made me unique and different from my relatives and old friends. It is almost as if we have come from different countries.

Another flaw in our arcadian image of small-town living is our belief that crime is less there or doesn't exist at all. TV and the newspapers have shown us that crime and drugs are everywhere. The small town or rural area is not exempt. Crime, and especially youth crime, is universal in this country. Drugs and guns have permeated every corner of our society and a change of location does in no way promise an escape from its consequences.

Local schools are under much fire and threatened with the pernicious Proposition 174, but I am convinced that the child who is both desirous of learning and capable of doing so, can learn in virtually any school - if he or she has the active support of the parents. A child who doesn't want to learn and whose parents are disinterested, can go to any school, anywhere, and continue to do poorly.

Many who leave our area speak glibly of that fragile concept, "quality of life," and there is something to be said for it. The uniqueness of each family can most certainly make it happier and more productive in a setting that meets its needs. The family which truly needs a slower and less complex style of living can, probably, with some luck in getting reasonable neighbors, find more happiness in a rural or small-town setting, while a family attuned to the fast lane would languish quickly there.

But those whose departures are based on fear will most certainly find that the thing they feared came along with them in their baggage.

The San Diego area has changed much, even in the 25 years that I've lived here. But it remains one of the ideal places on earth to reside. And I suspect that even among those long-time southlanders whose transplant elsewhere has been successful, there are all too frequent longings for a return.

As for the rest who, in leaving, derogate San Diego, let them leave - we're better off without them.

From Where I Sit

Batteries not included

by Frank Andrews

Nowadays, "batteries not included" and "minimum assembly required" is stamped on most of the merchandise that we buy. In some cases the batteries cost as much or more than the gimmick itself. As far as the minimum assembly required and the instructions that go with it, only a mechanical engineer could understand.

Recently, I purchased a glider swing for our patio with "only minimum assembly required" in small letters on the carton. Well, it took me one whole day to get the simple thing put together. After several months out in the weather, the metal parts rusted and the wood slats were black with the start of rot.

It took nearly as long to take the thing apart as it did to assemble it. I purchased a can of red enamel and a couple of spray cans of ivory for the metal. After proper preparation, I completed one coat. Before putting on the second coat, I happened to read the labels on the paint (when all else fails, try reading the instructions). "Caution" be sure to second coat within 24 hours or wait 72 to recoat. Both paints had similar precautions.

Now I was confused. Before applying the second coat you have to check a clock or calendar to apply the paint properly. I spent most of a day putting all this mess back together again. I have painted since day one, but never seen such instructions.

The so-called toys of the modern generation cost an arm and a leg (batteries not included). The prices are staggering with all the sophisticated toys of the kids' world. Miniature racers, computer games, uniforms and equipment are needed to be better than the kid down the block.

I can remember in the tough times when I grew up, everything, including toys, was so simple. I used to roll an old rubber tire down the road with a stick. A swing on a tree limb could be made with a piece of rope and that same old rubber tire. In winter there were endless possibilities for fun at no cost at all. We could slide down the hills that were covered with snow on the same old tire as in summer.

Some of the games we played were jacks, pull-a-way, tag, hide-and-seek - to name a few. There were never enough hours in a day for all the things we wanted to do. Even with all the expensive toys of this day, kids seem to have too much leisure time on their hands and some of them get into big trouble.

I am glad that I was raised in the country. Did you know that a farmer is "a man outstanding in his field?"

Mount Miguel's football program is rebuilding

by Tim Kazules

There was no joy in Mudville and, last Friday, there was no joy for Mt. Miguel fans and their Varsity football team.

New Head Coach Mark Deesing and his all new staff this year is trying to bring back the teams' long-lost tradition of greatness. As a former student at Mt. Miguel, Coach Deesing remembers his team as " The team to beat," as it was worthy competition for Helix.

This season this new tradition is starting. However, the 0-3 record that the Varsity has started with does not show just how much the team has improved. Changes have found their way into not only the physical abilities and training of the players, but in their attitudes as well. A seriousness has come over the players. Friday night's disappointing loss to Monte Vista did not discourage the team; rather it drove them to fight harder and to want success even more.

In a meeting with the team, both Principal Brian Smith and Vice Principal Dana Shelburne stressed the importance of eligibility. They said that each player was "an ambassador of Mt. Miguel," and should strive to bring back the respect that they deserve. To fight ineligibility and to teach the players better study skills, Coach Deesing has consulted with Mrs. Edler to start an AVID (Advancement Via Individual Determination) program.

Now the players are required to attend the study-hall/AVID meetings twice a week after school. Coach Deesing hopes that his team will attain at least a 2.8 grade-point average.

As a way of bringing the players together, a trip was arranged down to the Navy base at 32nd Street. While there, the players boarded a missile cruiser where they had a team picture taken under the twin missile launcher. After the photo, the players were given a 20-minute tour of the ship. It is with events like the field trip that the coaches hope to establish a higher sense of camaraderie within the players.

Backing up their Varsity counterparts, and showing a very promising future, is the Mt. Miguel J.V. team. The sophomore and freshman team have gotten of to a great start. Their record is 2-0-1, and last Friday they beat Monte Vista 37-6. For the new program that Coach Deesing has started, the J.V. team is a shining a bright ray of hope for the future.
